Choose the best answer for each question.

Computerization has changed high school education in many ways. The first is the use of the computer as a teaching aid for teachers. The next is the massive data storage and fast gain from computers. In early 1980s, only 20% of high school teachers in the US used computers. However, since then high schools in the US have computerized rapidly. In 1987, schools acquired about 1.5 million computers with 95% of the schools having at least one computer. At school, teachers can use a computer to bring texts, sound and pictures into a classroom. With a computer, they can more readily attract and retain students' attention. Computers can also speed up the teaching process and make difficult-to-explain ideas easier to understand. This means that teachers can spend more time answering students' questions and catering for other needs. Computer software can shorten the learning process by illustrating real world applications of abstract theories.
